THE WAR POWERS OF THE GOV-think it of essential service to give the follow-ing extracts from Miss Carroll's pumphiet on ing extracts from Miss Carroll's pamphlet on The War Powers of the Government," which, in the estimation of many of the most eminent jurists of the country, was the first to place this power upon its true foundation:

For this martial law differs from civil law in the same manner as a state of war is opposed to a state of peace. War has its own law as well as peace. The law of war is martial law. But martial law is nothing more than the application of military force to overcome the resistance of an enemy who acknowledges no other rule than that of force. And hence, in the presence of such an enemy, the military commander must necessarily have the power to set aside every civil authority which might assume to interfere, in any way, so as to control or embarras the operations of the war. A denial of this power virtually carries with it the denial of any power to render war effectual in any case whatsonyer. If the civil judge can issue a writ of electrocal for the ground upon which a military encampment or fortress is situated, or replects for the artillery horacs on the eve of battle, or a Achees corpus to bring before him the bodies of soldiers or captives alleged to be illegally detailed, then there is an end of all military authority, and the commander might as well raise the white flag and submit to the enemy at once.

Hence, it is unquestionable that the chief of any distinct military command must necessarily have the right to employ martial law. But that is the right to exclude the civil judge, And that, again, is per se, a suspension of the writ of Asbess corpus.

that again, is per se, a suspension of the writ of habes corpus.

And thus, the old maxim, infer erms leges elect, is as true now as it was the day when Cleero penned it.

It is the command of the military chief, giving his orders to the nillitary force, which hushes the laws into so deep a silence.

But even the proclamation of marital law does not supersede the ordinary functions of judicial power to any greater extent than may be requisite to accomplish the special military purpose of the occasion which necessitates the measure. It does not confer upon the commander any authority to try offences other than those against the usages of war. It does not invest him with a commission to determine civil suits between private parties.

He is arbiter only in the great controversy of arms, and he applies to the issue before him, not the rule of municipal jurisprudence, but the stern law of war. His sole office is to direct the use of military force so as to conquer a given resistance, and he removes out of he was given resistance, and he removes out of he was given resistance.

arms, and he applies to the lesue before him not the rule of municipal jurisprudence, but the stern law of war. His sole office is to direct the use of military force so as to conquer a given resistance, and he removes out of his way whatever impediment may tend to prevent or obstruct the successful employment of that force. Hence, if even judicial authority stands in the way, he puts it saide for the time. But this definition of martial law obviously leaves the judge at liberty to sit in all cases which dnot fall within the province of military command, or otherwise affect such means as may be dictated by the policy of war.

We have now reached the last question appertaining to the general subject of power, and this refers to the authority of the President to arrest and imprison the persons of alleged friends and adherents of the rebellion in the loyal States.

If one examines this inquiry with proper attention and freedom from prejudice, he cannot fall to be astonished that it should ever have been mooted at all. For, can it master, in the view of the Counstituion, in what part of the View of the Counstituion, in what part of the writ of Abbess corpus to "be suspended," provided the necessity results from a case of "invasion" or "rebellion," waged anywhere against the national flag?

Tor can it matter, according to the laws of "or can it matter, according to the laws of "or any hast locality an adherent of the public enemy may choose to carry on the work of a common hostility! If a foe taken on the batter share that hat of a rebel soldier?

But neither the man of Virginia nor the man of Maryland can be said to be imprisoned the civil authority only. but both of them are imprisoned because he is assumed to be a trained to the country of the presented as a country of the provided the necessity and the provided in Virginia may be imprisoned to the provided in Virginia may be imprisoned to the provided in Virginia may be imprisoned to the result of the provided in Virginia may be imprisoned to the virginia nor th the civil authority only: but both of them are imprisoned because they belong to the revolu-tionary force, which is exclusively a military reason. And can this be represented as a matter of grave complaint? What! Shall it be said that any person can plead, as a cause of exemption from confinement, the singular excuse that, besides being an enemy, he is a traitor also?

It is as clear as sun-light to all who are willing to see, that the same provisions of the Constitution, and the same laws of civil war, which justify the Government in imprisoning its fock taken in open fight, will equally justify it in the capture and detention, not only of those who may be on the march to join the enemy, but also of those who may be secretly preparing to raise the colors of the enemy on any part of the national territory.

Hence, it follows that whenever an insurrectionary force is organized, in any country, and especially when it puts forth the claim to act especially when it puts forth the claim to act as an independent power, then the lawful government has necessarily the right to treat such adverse force, and all those who adhere to its pelection, as public enemies, at least ad factorin; and therefore, to deal with them according to the entablished usages of war. In other words, the Government may choose to admit provisionally, or for belilgerent purposes, the assertion of the revolutionary power, and of its adherents, that it is an independent public enemy, and therefore may act upon that assumption, not as an abstract truth, but as a practical postulate granted on the other side. For, certainly, there can be no wrong or shadow of injustice in attributing to any person the very instinct in attributing to any person the very justice in attributing to any person the very character which he claims, at the peril of life itself, to be his own.

It is, indeed, very true that the Government is not obliged to recognize this character of beligerents asserted by the forces of the rebellion. To do so is the concession, for a time, of pretended.

The Government, if it should see fit, may consider the matter in a far different light; and may treat it as question of bald treason, by turning over all captives taken in arms, as well as all active adherents of the insurrection, to be tried and punished in the criminal courts. And it must do either the one or the other. It tunst imprison or it must punish, or eise renounce all pretensions of political authority, and virtually abdicate its functions. There is no other imaginable alternative.

Now, suppose the Government to exercise its no other imaginable alternative.

Now, suppose the Government to exercise its prerogative to try and punish while the war is going on, and the event more or less doubtful. One general outburst of indignation would be heard from the whole civilized world against the barbarity of such a proceeding, and none would be louder in their censure than those pretended friends of constitutional freedom, who now so bitterly assail the Administration for exploying the more humane and render term. oloying the more humane and prudent rep

Therefore, there was but one course left for the Government, namely, to imprison all cap-tives mult the question of their final guilt shall be determined by the result of the war.

The Cute Lawyer and the Lucky Re The Reading (Pa.) Times has the following amosing anecdote of the draft: Commissioner Kupp was very precise and ex amusing sneedote of the draft:

Commissioner Kupp was very precise and exact in his proceedings; always keeping an eye to the interest of the country, while dealing inomrably wish all. Now it happened that among the able-bodied men drafted from one of the Heidelbergs there was an an obese specimen of humanity, but whom the chances hit as one of the elect. When he received his "ticket for soup" he, hastened to Reading, and knowing where lived the cutest specimen of a lawyer, he went straight to his office. Said he:

"I'm drafted!"

"The denuce you are; it must have been a strong man that drafted you."

"Hero," said the lawyer, "Commissioner,

"Here," sain the lawyer, "Commissioner, I have got a substitute."
Commissioner looked at the wheesy specimen for some time, "He wou't do; can't march."
"But he must do," blustered out the lawyer;
"and you know he will."
"He can't march; he won't do; and I can't take him."
This is what our smart friend wanted.
"He won't do, ch!"
"No; he won't do,"
"Well, then, scratch his name off the list; he is drafted; and wants to be exempted!"
The Commissioner looked at the lawyer for about a minute; then regarded the fat draft, and without speaking a word, scratched off his name.
